The UK government will introduce a "sugar tax" next year in an attempt to tackle health issues like growing obesity and diabetes. Q25. A new government review of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 has proposed that people should in future be allowed to legally decide which sex they are simply by self-definition, without the current medical or psychological assessments which can take two years or more. This would mean abolishing all current single-sex public spaces, such as women-only changing rooms and men-only toilets, and it would become a hate crime to disagree with someone about which sex they were. Broadly speaking, what is your view of this proposal? The UK government will introduce a "sugar tax" next year in an attempt to tackle health issues like growing obesity and diabetes. In order to avoid the tax, drinks manufacturers have responded by reducing the amount of sugar in drinks like Irn-Bru and replacing it with cheaper artificial sweeteners which alter the flavour.		569	355	98	254	241	60	328	2	3	0	0	92	29	12

Q25. A new government review of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 has proposed that people should in future be allowed to legally decide which sex they are simply by self-definition, without the current medical or psychological assessments which can take two years or more. This would mean abolishing all current single-sex public spaces, such as women-only changing rooms and men-only toilets, and it would become a hate crime to disagree with someone about which sex they were. Broadly speaking, what is your view of this proposal?		569	355	98	254	241	60	328	2	3	0	0	92	29	12
