The UK government will introduce a "sugar tax" next year in an attempt to tackle health issues like growing obesity and diabetes. In order to avoid the tax, drinks manufacturers have responded by reducing the amount of sugar in drinks like Irn-Bru and replacing it with cheaper artificial sweeteners which alter the flavour. Q25. A new government review of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 has proposed that people should in future be allowed to legally decide which sex they are simply by self-definition, without the current medical or psychological assessments which can take two years or more. This would mean abolishing all current single-sex public spaces, such as women-only changing rooms and men-only toilets, and it would become a hate crime to disagree with someone about which sex they were. Broadly speaking, what is your view of this proposal? Q25. A new government review of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 has proposed that people should in future be allowed to legally decide which sex they are simply by self-definition, without the current medical or psychological assessments which can take two years or more. This would mean abolishing all current single-sex public spaces, such as women-only changing rooms and men-only toilets, and it would become a hate crime to disagree with someone about which sex they were. Broadly speaking, what is your view of this proposal?		1022	848	92	82	107	176	211	529	421	520	81	392	532	63	4

Approximately 900 parades or marches by Loyalist organisations like the Grand Orange Lodge and the Apprentice Boys of Derry take place in Scotland each year. Some people regard these as provocative sectarian events likely to result in disorder or violence, while others regard them as a matter of fundamental freedom of expression and a celebration of cultural heritage. Others marches are conducted by various political groups or organisations, including those on the far right, and some also consider political marches to be provocative and/or dangerous. Approximately 900 parades or marches by Loyalist organisations like the Grand Orange Lodge and the Apprentice Boys of Derry take place in Scotland each year. Some people regard these as provocative sectarian events likely to result in disorder or violence, while others regard them as a matter of fundamental freedom of expression and a celebration of cultural heritage. Others marches are conducted by various political groups or organisations, including those on the far right, and some also consider political marches to be provocative and/or dangerous.
